“Evaluating Residential Experience in Social Housing Projects: A Costa Rican Study”

Prof. Helga VON BREYMANN MIRANDA
University of Costa Rica

Abstract

This presentation reports findings from a study of 15 social housing developments in Costa Rica, evaluating resident experiences. The research aimed to identify how physical-spatial characteristics of buildings and neighborhoods, alongside psychosocial variables, including place attachment and perceived discrimination, contribute to residential satisfaction. Results highlight the interplay between these factors in shaping the lived experience of social housing residents.
