Due to the intensive territory, energy and food needs caused by the inevitable population growth, the importance of the balance between the built and natural environment is decreasing. This balance must be restored through conscious methods, humble and modest planning with a nature integrated into buildings, living spaces based on community cohesion and public spaces based on a new social structure. These spaces need to be created that reinforce the sense of 'natural belonging' that is increasingly lost. For the healthy balance and protection of our environment, we architects have a major responsibility...
